

INFORMATION NOTE

Measurement of Efficiency of the Administration of the Judiciary

1. Background

1.1 On 6 April 2000 the Public Accounts Committee (PAC) expressed concern about "utilization of judicial time" and noted that there had not been any increase in "court sitting hours" of judges in Hong Kong over the years. The PAC requested that a research be conducted on three aspects in overseas jurisdictions, namely, established standards for the average court sitting hours for different levels of courts, the arrangements for listing court cases, and monitoring of judicial time. The PAC suggested on 17 April 2000 that the research be continued after the expiry of the previous term of the Council and that the report be forwarded to the Panel on Administration of Justice and Legal Services in the second term of the Council for consideration and follow-up.

1.2 The Panel considered a Progress Report (IN 1/00-01) on 17 October 2000 and advised that the research study should not proceed further.

2. Methodology

2.1 We have sent enquiries to six common law jurisdictions, namely, the United Kingdom, the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and Singapore. We have studied reference books and relevant documents and articles obtained from different libraries and the Internet.

3. Findings

3.1 The indicator of court sitting hours does not seem to be a standard measurement of the efficiency of the administration of the judiciary in the above common law jurisdictions, nor is monitoring of judicial time a commonly adopted practice. Details of the findings are summarized in Appendix I for easy reference.

3.2 In the course of our study, we have come across the following indicators which are more commonly adopted in the six common law jurisdictions to measure the efficiency of the administration of the judiciary:

---

---

Output Indicators

- number of cases received
- number of cases heard or determined
- number of cases otherwise disposed of
- number of cases pending at the end of the year

Input Indicators

- judges sitting days in a year
- average waiting time (weeks) at various stages of trial or appeal

3.3 In the U.S., studies made by academics or independent organizations on judicial workload have made a detailed breakdown of the working day of a judge as follows: (a) the amount of time devoted to case-related matters; and (b) the amount of time devoted to non-case-related matters, e.g. docket management, administrative time, general and legal research, opinion writing, judicial meetings, public education, civic activities. The purpose of the breakdown is to make inter-state comparison of how judges spend their time on different types of cases in order to derive a formula to transform caseload into workload.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> To derive a figure for workload involved in moving a case from filing to disposal, the number of raw filings is categorized by types, e.g. family, tort, criminal, other civil, etc. and then each is given a case weight according to the judge time it would likely consume.
