Common Look and Feel for Government Web Sites

Introduction

This paper briefs Members on the Government's initiative to adopt a Common Look and Feel (CLF) for government web sites in order to project a consistent online brand image, provide for a consistent user experience and to improve the navigability and usability of the web sites of the HKSARG.

Background

2. Web services to the public are currently provided through about 200 web sites and portals of government bureaux and departments and 60 web sites and portals of government-related organisations (e.g. tertiary institutions, Electronic Service Delivery). The sites vary greatly in how they look and how information is organised and presented. There is little commonality. This is far from ideal for users.

3. We commissioned surveys to get feedback and suggestions from the public, from web service providers (i.e. government bureaux/departments and government-related organisations hosting the web sites) and from corporate web service users (i.e. IT bodies). The consensus was that CLF would be an important first step in projecting a consistent online brand image and improving the navigability and usability of government web sites. Members of the public and IT bodies wished to see improvements in the accuracy and timeliness of information, consistency in web layout and navigation logic - and more linkages between web pages. Government departments indicated a strong preference to retain some departmental identity and independence in what information to present and how to present them; and that they would normally revamp their web sites every 2-3 years. Government-related organisations indicated that CLF should not be mandatory for them.

4. We also looked at six leading E-government countries. The results showed that governments have made considerable progress and commitment towards the development and introduction of CLF to enhance web-users' experience. Canada has made the highest resource and funding commitment towards the establishment, maintenance and implementation of CLF across government organisations, followed by UK, Australia, USA, Taiwan and Singapore. Hong Kong's position is between Taiwan and Singapore.

CLF Designs, Standards and Guidelines

5. In order to give government web sites and portals a consistent online brand image; to improve navigation and information presentation from the users perspective so as to enable citizens to navigate our web sites with ease and find what they want; and in overall terms, to inspire confidence in users when using our web services, we have developed the CLF web page designs at Annexes I – III. The designs have taken into consideration ease of navigation, flexibility to cater for the wide variety of existing designs, implementation effort, image of Government, conformity with existing standards, and the ability for individual bureaux/departments to maintain their unique identity.

6. The salient improvements of the CLF designs are summarised below:-

- | | |
|-------------------------------------|--|
| Cover page
(Template at Annex I) | <ul style="list-style-type: none">- Consistent use and positioning of the Brand Hong Kong logo, HKSARG emblem or departmental logo will help to promote the online brand name of the HKSARG;- Availability of language and viewing device selection will facilitate web users, particularly overseas users; and- Retention of departmental logo and freedom to choose background design/photo as display of departmental identity. |
|-------------------------------------|--|

- Content page
(Template at Annex II)
- CLF header, with
 - Consistent use and positioning of Brand HK logo, HKSARG emblem or departmental logo; and
 - Mandatory horizontal bar to facilitate navigation.
 - CLF footer, with
 - Important notices including disclaimer and that of copyright to clarifying the legal liability of the Government; and
 - Last update date to indicate timeliness of the information.
 - Standardisation and rationalisation of common functions in the vertical bar to provide structure for information presentation and facilitate navigation.
(Template at Annex III)

7. To facilitate adoption, we have developed specifications on colour code, logo size, background finish, font type/size etc; and guidelines on navigation, information presentation and links provision for reference by bureaux and departments.

Implementation

8. Government bureaux and departments will adopt the CLF designs during their normal web site revamping exercise over the coming two to three years. However, in order to have a meaningful launching impact, we will accord priority to the highly utilized sites of Labour Department, Information Services Department and Hong Kong Observatory. We shall carry out follow-up surveys to gauge public response and obtain feedback.

9. Government-related organisation will be asked to use the Brand Hong Kong logo and to link to the Government Homepage of the Government Information Centre (GIC) on a voluntary basis.

Conclusion

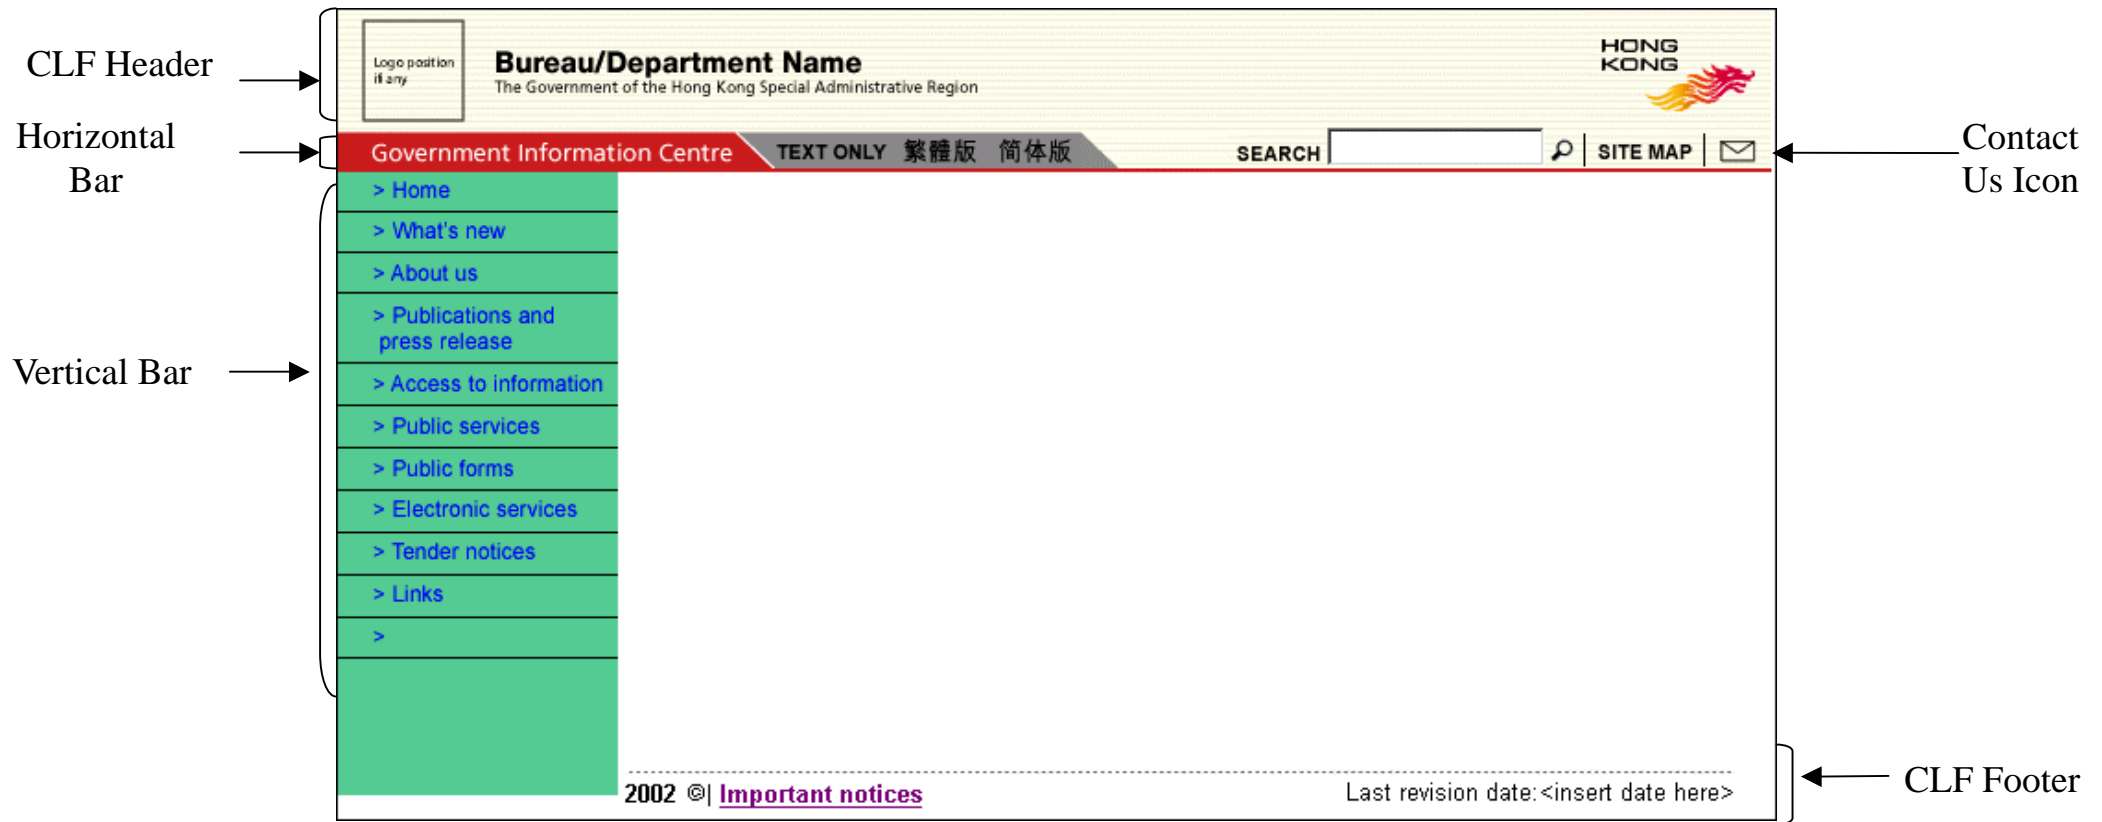

10. Members are invited to note the contents of this paper.
