PAPERS

THE COLONIAL SECRETARY: —By Your Excellency's command I lay upon the table certain papers, copies of which are already in the hands of honourable Members.

I must invite the particular attention of honourable Members to one of these papers, namely, the Report on the Salary Scales of Women Officers in the Public Service. This paper describes in some detail the thought that has been given to the question of women's salary scales since the War by the Government, the Staff Associations and the various Salaries Commissions.

The most recent of these Commissions, the 1959 Salaries Commission recommended that women officers should be paid a salary equal to 75% of that of their male colleagues. That is the position today, although there are exceptions; for example, women labourers and artisans receive equal pay with men but a lower cost of living allowance, and single Women Medical Officers, who have three years' post-qualification experience, receive exactly the same pay as male doctors.

The 1959 Salaries Commission used these words—

"If we can find no principle which justifies the general adoption of equal pay, we equally can find no principle which excludes equality in cases where in the judgment of the Government it is fully justified. Such cases must be found in the senior ranks of the Service, and particularly among professional officers of status. Where there are such officers of full professional standing with equal qualifications and doing precisely the same work, we can well understand how unjust and galling a differential in emoluments must appear. None of the objections we have mentioned apply, and we think that the Government should regard itself as free to decide such cases on their merits without fear of damaging precedent".

The first matter which had to be decided was who were professional officers. Superficially this did not seem to appear very difficult since Model Scale 10 is specifically designed for Administrative and Professional Officers. The problem was not, however, as easy as it seemed for, to take only one example, in the teaching world some teachers are serving on Scale 10 and others are on different scales; but all consider themselves to be professional officers. The attempt to define a professional officer was, therefore, abandoned. The present scheme is based solely on salary levels and on whether or not the officer is on temporary terms of service. These two criteria are, I think, reasonable since salary levels give a fair indication of seniority in the sense intended by the Platt Commission, while the extent to which a woman officer can concentrate on her Government duties (as against her family commitments) is also relevant. The reasons for and against applying the new scheme to married officers (all of whom are on temporary terms of service) are given in detail in the Report and I think there will be no good purpose served by repeating them here.

Very briefly, Sir, the scheme involves: —

First: the gradual elimination between the salary point $1,200 and $2,865 (which are the women officers' equivalent of $1,600 and $3,820 on the male scale) the gradual elimination of the existing 25% differential between male and female salaries;

Second: giving a woman officer exactly the same salary as her male colleague once she has reached a salary of $2,865 on her existing scale; to achieve this parity on the Professional Scale 10 could require up to 15 years' service;

and Third: restricting these benefits to officers on probation, or on the pensionable establishment, or on contract, that is to say, to single women.

About 5.8% of women officers would benefit, excluding staff on Scale 1. The increase in salary will be modest at the lower end of the scale and quite substantial at the upper end.

The cost of the scheme is estimated at $676,000 a year but this increase as more women reach the higher ranks of the Service.
