		advise whether clause 18, as presently drafted, has incorporated all the grounds for refusal of registration of foreign judgments under common law and statute law advise whether the use of "public policy" and "fraud" as grounds for setting aside the registration of Mainland judgments is sufficient to deal with future challenges relating to the concept of "natural justice" in Hong Kong clarify whether new evidence has to be provided by a judgment debtor making an application to set aside the registration of a judgment on the ground of "fraud" under clause 18 of the Bill, having regard to ALA6's comments that while no new evidence is required for an application under Cap. 319, this is not the case under common law and a House of Lords' case in 1992 is relevant review whether the drafting of clause 18 reflects Article 9 of the Arrangement, having regard to members' following observations -
		(i) Article 9 is divided into two paragraphs. Under paragraph 1 of the Article, a judgment debtor is required to prove to the satisfaction of the court that the judgment should not be enforced under the grounds listed in (1) to (6). Under paragraph 2 of the Article, the court has the discretion not to enforce a judgment on the ground that it is contrary to "social and public interest" in the Mainland or "public policy" in Hong Kong
		(ii) the formulation of clause 18 is different. All the grounds (including "public policy") against enforcement of judgments are set out in clause 18(1) of the Bill. In addition, a judgment debtor is required to prove to the satisfaction of the court that a judgment should not be enforced
