

ivory ban

To whom it may concern:

Having been much involved in wild life conservation work for the last ten years or so I am deeply concerned at the prospect of the ivory ban being derailed due to compensation issues. There should be no compensation paid as traders have had plenty of warning and it risks an increase in trade for an already desperately beleaguered species. Elephants in Africa are a key stone species with many other species of flora and fauna depending on their presence.

Please be sure to help their survival by doing the right thing and not being derailed by 'commercial interests'.

Elephants survival depends upon your decision in conjunction with many others.

I look forward to hearing from you.

Kindest regards, Mrs Brennink.
