70 years on, WWII munitions still pose a risk

Expert says 30% of ordnances failed to explode, were left in place for decades, littering tropical island

The rusting hulks of tanks and field artillery are a common sight in the jungles of Peleliu, but the fighting that scarred the Pacific island in WWII also left a more dangerous legacy — unexploded bombs.

A Japanese airfield made the 10-kilometer (six-mile) long island a prized asset during the conflict, with the Americans determined to seize it at any cost.

The island — about an hour's boat ride from the Palau capital Koror — underwent months of aerial and naval bombardment before US marines launched an amphibious invasion in September 1944 that was expected to take just three days.

Instead, the assault dragged on for almost three months and became one of the bloodiest encounters in the Allied "island hopping" campaign, claiming about 13,000 Japanese and 3,000 American lives.

On the island today, reminders of the war are everywhere — the wreckage of a

He said many Palauans mistakenly believed the bombs were not dangerous because they had not detonated in 70 years, but their age actually increased the problem.

"They are getting old, they are deteriorating," he said,

"Some of this ordnance, once it gets exposed to air it can undergo a chemical change that makes it more dangerous."

Work was proceeding with a water cutter to get through the fuse of the bomb when it went off. It was due to be defused at 10,30pm but detonated at 9,45pm,

Fire department officials went from door-to-door to enforce the evacuation, after fire trucks had passed through the streets, instructing residents with loudspeaker announcements to leave their homes immediately.
