Over the past 30 years, Hong Kong government has spent so much money on training local clinical psychologists in HKU and CUHK. And psychology professors and experienced psychologists have devoted so much time and effort in training and supervising clinical psychology trainees. These clinical psychology programmes are very strict in requirement and almost every year there are students who are kicked out. Besides, the Division of Clinical Psychology of the Hong Kong Psychological Society all along has been setting high standard in members' registration. The reasons behind all these are to ensuring quality and protecting the public.

Therefore, if there are problems with a training programme, including admission requirements and lack of practicing clinical psychologists in supervising placements, why the government and the profession could accept their graduates to be accepted in AR?
